Excerpt from The Obligation of Contracts Clause of the United States Constitution The obligation of a contract is, of course, chiefly determined by the language of the particular contract in question, and the courts must necessarily interpret this language for themselves, so that, in many cases, perhaps in the greater part of those here reviewed, the court is engaged simply in construing the language of particular contracts. It is doing what any state court might have to do, under the ordinary law or under provisions in the state constitution, and which the Supreme Court itself might have had to do under the due process clause of the federal Constitution, as well as under the contracts clause. As one of the parties to these contracts is a State, however, a new aspect is put upon the question; the contract is no longer construed by the ordinary rules; it is interpreted in the light of a special canon of construction that has been adopted by the courts, namely, that all such contracts are to be construed strictly against the grantee and in...
